When Good Employees Do Bad Things

Understanding the dark side of power and how you can help improve employees' decision making skills

We often believe that doing the “right thing” is a voluntary personal choice. However, while having a personal code of ethics is the core of good decision making; promoting a culture of ethical behavior in the workplace is first and foremost a key leadership responsibility.

In an era where police scandals make the front pages daily, teaching employees to be able to make ethical decisions should be a top priority for all managers who want to promote better work practices and protect the integrity of their agency

This workshop is designed to provide managers with practical tools and strategies for effectively dealing with difficult decisions and fostering an ethical workplace culture.

Through research and real-life case participants will:

- Understand how their own actions and management style can serve as a barrier or facilitator for employees' ethical decision making
- Learn to develop clear ethical governance practices by learning key principles of powerful ethical management.
- Be able identify the antecedents of ethical failure: excuses and pressures
- How to help good employees avoid bad decisions and their unintended consequence
